

The 12-sided dodecahedron die can correspond to any set of twelve, determined by the individual. The randomness of rolling the die, with sincere questions and consecrated intentions, opens up possibilities for practical applications of guidance from the higher aspects of Oneself.

Yes or No questions can be asked with, 'Odds are Yes, Evens are No.' From experience, it's suggested to avoid asking predictive questions such as how market prices will go, or ones involving the will of another person. Important decisions are best not made with over-reliance on an oracle.

Rather, every response from this means can be verified with intuitive feeling, or sound reasoning. Approached playfully and creatively, it becomes a highly beneficial learning experience. When used in conjunction with the AHA! Oracle, it can also be a powerful customizable personal development journey.

Since the dodecahedron die doesn't have a zero, when 10 is rolled, the symbolism of 10, 1 and 0 may apply.

Rolling a die has been used in various cultures and spiritual traditions as a form of divination or seeking guidance from the divine. For example:

The I Ching, or Book of Changes, is an ancient Chinese divination system that utilizes hexagrams composed of broken and solid lines. Some versions of the I Ching involve the casting of yarrow sticks or coins, while others use dice. By casting the dice and interpreting the resulting hexagram, practitioners seek guidance on decisions, situations, or life paths.

Divination and an oracle are related concepts often used interchangeably, but they have distinct meanings and implications.
